Beginning Music Theory and Ear Training: Strengths and Weaknesses Beginning Music Theory and Ear Training: Strengths and Weaknesses This Lesson covers a few points about Music Theory and Ear Training and addresses some of the strengths and weaknesses of these subjects. But first I need to address something about ear training. I've seen several people talk about ear training and there is some confusion about what it is and what it isn't. So let's get that straight up front. There is NO such thing as ear training. Ear training is something you do yourself (with audio recordings). Ear training is not about how good your ears are. Why should you not depend on the recordings? Because, if the recording is wrong, you'll be lost! You can't depend on recordings you buy. We are all at the mercy of the producer/engineer. So I'm still talking about Ear Training and not Ear Training. You can gain lots of interesting information from the recordings and if you train yourself as you listen, you can quickly learn many things. The key is to put more attention on the things that YOU care about and not get distracted by the signals you hear on recordings. There is an art to doing this. I'm not interested in teaching Ear Training so I won't talk about it much. So, back to Music Theory. What can I say about Music Theory? What I'm most familiar with is the Pitch Theory sections of Grade Ten Music Theory. On the surface this seems simple but it's not, because there are two things to be aware of.
