The level of transcription factors such as STAT3, NFkB and p53 is important in cancer treatment. The degree of their expression is influenced by the proteins which target them. To date, two clinically approved STAT3-targeting agents have been developed: arsenic trioxide (ATO) and Rhein. Other therapeutic approaches involve inhibition of NFkB and p53 transcriptional activities. Until recently, peptide-based targeting of STAT3 and NFkB was largely unexplored. However, because of their small size, these approaches have the advantage of high specificity and are easily translated into clinical agents. We developed a new sequence-optimized, peptidomimetic inhibitor, TGI-1037. TGI-1037 binds to STAT3 through its conserved DNA binding domain. This peptide has shown strong anti-proliferative and apoptotic activity in preclinical models of hematologic malignancies and solid tumors. We propose to develop TGI-1037 into a Phase I/II clinical trial in acute myeloid leukemia (AML) (Aim 1). In Aim 2, we will develop a structural model of the STAT3-TGI-1037 complex in order to understand the molecular features of this interaction. We also propose to use biophysical techniques to investigate the interaction between TGI-1037 and the two proteins NFkB and p53, and the
