Molecular basis of a F(o)F(1)-ATPase high affinity dephosphorylation site in protein kinase B. A highly conserved histidine (H372) residue in protein kinase B (PKB/Akt) is required for its regulation by the low-molecular-mass cAMP-dependent protein kinase (cAMP-PK), and this residue is the site of phosphorylation by protein phosphatase 2A (PP2A). It has been demonstrated that the polypeptide sequence and location of this H372 residue are evolutionarily conserved among the evolutionarily homologous PP2A types. Here, we show that the substitution of this H372 residue with alanine destabilizes the conformation of the M and N lobe of PKB, but not the F(o)F(1)-ATPase, in the dephosphorylation reactions of the recombinant PKB protein. By contrast, the substitution of this H372 residue with arginine increases the conformational stability of both the M and N lobe, but does not affect the conformational stability of the
