What's new in Darold The Doomer: Psychedelic Lucid Dreams:

The album was entirely created by Sicthingy, and is intended to showcase the beauty and complexity of Sicthingy's music on its own for posterity, as it is not part of an existing work. Features The songs have all been arranged, played, arranged and orchestrated specifically for the album. The symphonic and instrumental compositions are primarily written using the Berkshire Hammond Organ, and some of the music is inspired by the British seaside, being based around Gilded Age music (while trying to avoid retro-futurism). The album has also been recorded with a rather antiquated mid-century Swedish Vox Humana organ, made by the magical hand of legendary saxophonist/producer Bruno Tommaso of the Mod/British jazz/pop band The Herd. The music is available to listen to in full, and as individual stems. They have been mixed in a live environment, and justly so - they are what they are intended to be played in the way they were meant to be heard in the first place. In this case, it was not deemed useful or even right to create orchestral versions of the instrumental songs, which is what most soundtracks are intended to do. All the songs were instead orchestrated, created from the stems, and matched directly to the performance of the organ instrument. This has allowed for several (especially instrumental) songs to be re-arranged, and also to see and hear the songs in a different light, as they aren't mimicking an existing orchestral soundtrack, so it's easier to create large-scale sound effects, and to pull back from the actual performance of the main instrument, to allow for more focusing on the music (piano, organ and organ backing vocals), or to hide behind a whole orchestra with nothing to represent it. Other notable original songs include "Coral Spears Coral Bolts", meant to showcase and document the beauty of one of the featured organs, and not some small set of notes that sat behind a speaker. We also had some fun with a piece called "Optimismoscope", which was meant to take you on a journey into the heart and soul of our main organ character. If you enjoy the music you are free to take it and use it in your own work - just let the author know first, of course. If you're enjoying it we hope you'll take the time to follow these lovely people, there

KEK is a High Energy Accelerator Research Complex in the southern part of Japan. It is the second largest particle collider in the world. This app simulates the inside of the Belle II detector in the Experimental Hall F of KEK. It is designed for casual exploration. The Main control interface: There are a series of useful in-game control panels that appear as the user moves around the exhibit. The Window's control interface: With this window, the user's head movements are mapped to the experiment's internal camera, and the user's gaze is mapped to the experiment's image planes, where the user can interact with the simulation. The user can zoom into and out of the simulation, as well as control camera movement and rotation. The Main and Window's control interface with the Oculus Rift: The simulation operates with the Oculus Rift. When the Rift is on, the user's head movements are mapped to the experiment's internal camera, and the user's gaze is mapped to the experiment's image planes. The user can zoom into and out of the simulation. When the Rift is off, the simulation operates using the Window's interface; it does not track the user's gaze. In addition, the Oculus Rift provides Touch controllers that mimic your hands in the simulation. The user may use the controllers to interact with the simulation, opening up new control interfaces. For the Rift and Oculus Touch, there are three control modes: The main control: The user's head is mapped to the camera, allowing the user to look around the experiment. The user's gaze is mapped to the experiment's image planes, which are enabled when the User Looks function is on. The Window's control: The Window's interface is used, which does not track the user's gaze; it is similar to the experience of looking at images on a computer screen. The user's head movements are mapped to the experiment's internal camera, and the user's gaze is mapped to the experiment's image planes. In addition to the Rift and the Touch, this app is designed to function using a computer mouse, and it provides a view of the simulation on the computer screen with the Window's interface. This function is enabled when the Window's control mode is on. For non-Oculus Rift and Touch users, the simulation operates using the Window's interface. Note: The simulation can also be operated with a mouse and keyboard. For PC users: Both the Main and Window's interfaces in the Windows version
